Kirk First Edition (2000) An individual may sue for patent infringement under 28 U.S.C., only if the patentee or assignee is a legal entity. Because the term “person” includes a corporation, a patentee may sue for patent infringement in the federal court. patent infringement, if the entity is unable to sue. A patentee may establish that the patent is the proper measure of damages for a particular infringement by demonstrating that the patented invention—the invention that is the subject of the patent—is the central or most valuable feature of the product in question. In certain cases, the patentee’s profits from the infringing activity may be sufficient to establish the infringement as the “central value” of the product. Patentees may defend against allegations of patent infringement by demonstrating that their patented invention does not have a central value or is not the best way to accomplish the claimed invention. Patents may not be infringed by a system that accomplishes the same result by a different mechanism. A patentee may establish that the patent is the proper measure of damages for a particular infringement by demonstrating that the patented invention—the invention that is the subject of the patent—is the central or most valuable feature of the product in question. in the latter case, the patentee may be entitled to an award of royalties based
